COMMUNITY AND CULTURE

This month, Jessie Young, a Registered Nurse (RN) at Victoria Gold's Eagle Gold Mine and Cascia Krolczyk, the company's Human Resources Coordinator, organized and hosted traditional beading classes on site.

Several mine employees participated and the classes facilitated an opportunity to learn something new, come together, and share experiences; while exploring creativity in a safe, physically-distanced setting.

"I love getting together with other co-workers, especially when people have skills to share," says Cascia, who had never beaded before.

Says Fiona Lazzarotto, an Executive Assistant with Victoria Gold, "I have a whole new appreciation for beadwork. What I loved most was the collaborative spirit the classes fostered."

Historically, the Northern Tutchone people, which include the ancestors of today's First Nation of Na-Cho Nyak Dun citizens, traded extensively with the coastal Tlingit and subsequently, glass beads were introduced to Indigenous arts and culture in what is now the Yukon and beaded floral designs replaced traditional geometric shapes.

"These traditional beading classes at site are just another example of how teamwork equals results here at the Eagle Gold Mine." - Fiona Lazzarotto, Executive Assistant, Victoria Gold
